There are many 'recommendations' on the internet and in print on how to secure your wireless network. Some of them seem to be based on fact, and others just sound like they came from some infomercial created by some cable company. No matter what security settings you set on your router, you must be prepared for attack vectors that are not covered by those recommendations. You need to understand that someone is trying to attack you, and if they are successful it will all be your fault. As you are reading this there are two things that you must do. You must secure your access points and your wireless clients. Just securing a router isn't going to do you any good, you need to secure it as well as you can. You must secure your wireless clients. Most people today who purchase their laptops will not do any sort of security hardening. They will just buy their laptop and take it home, plug it in and let Windows 7 handle all the security. This is a big mistake, and it's the one that most people make. As a wireless client, you are now the weakest link in your network. They say "everyone is a target", and that is absolutely true. The biggest way that you can get hacked is to leave your wireless client up and unattended. Now this isn't something that you should expect from your employees, but it could happen. You are responsible for your network. No matter what security you apply to your router, someone is going to come along and exploit something. There are many ways that someone can exploit your network. They can be physical, but they could also be the result of a network worm or a remote execution. They could also be an issue with a misconfigured device. There are many ways that someone could exploit your network. Secure your wireless clients

If you want to secure your wireless clients, there are a few things that you need to do. The first thing that you need to do is limit the wireless access that is provided to the clients. You want to make sure that your clients are only able to connect to the access point. You don't want them having the ability to roam outside of your

LAN. Once you have a good understanding of the client traffic that is flowing on your network, you want to start to secure them. You should start by changing the SSID of the access point and make sure that it is unique. You should also make sure that the SSID is
