What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.5)?

Q: Storing extra data in the database and then retrieving it I'm pretty new to coding on the web. I'm trying to create a piece of code that will allow for users to input extra details for a media search. So, for example, I have a product search form where the users fills out some fields. When the form is submitted, all the data is stored on the users profile along with the userID. The userID, then, is used to retrieve all the data from the product db. My question is: is this the right way to do this. I realize that I can use one table for the information and another for user ID, but then the user would have to login again to input their data. I just want to make sure I'm going about the task correctly, because the more I think about it, the more I think it doesn't sound right. A: If you have a lot of fields, you might want to make a separate table to store extra data for the users. A: You could use SQL. Like this create table extraData(userID varchar(20), productID varchar(20), extraDataField varchar(50), extraData varchar(50), extraDataField2 varchar(50), extraData2 varchar(50), extraDataField3 varchar(50), extraData3 varchar(50) primary key(userID, productID) foreign key (productID) references product(productID)); You'll put the user's data into the table extraData with their userID, and then get their products with something like: select * from extraData where userID ='someuserID' and productID ='someproductID'; You could do things this way too, having extraData have a primary key of productID and userID, but I'd recommend that you use the extraData table because it can help you retain the data for each user.
