Field of the Invention This invention generally relates to devices for the illumination of underwater objects by underwater light and methods therefor. 2. Description of Related Art Illumination of underwater objects, such as fish, in a pond, aquarium, or the like is known. In particular, illumination of bottom and/or undersurface areas of the body of the fish is known to be beneficial as it reduces instances of capture and/or escape. Generally, fish illumination has been accomplished by illuminating light through the water or projecting a light onto the bottom of the pond or aquarium from the outside of the pond or aquarium. However, these known systems do not adequately illuminate the bottom or undersurface areas of the fish. For example, when using a light element that passes through the water, there are areas in the pond or aquarium that are not illuminated due to the shape of the pond or aquarium and the water. One of the benefits of having a fish pond or aquarium is the ability to enjoy watching fish within the ponds or aquarium. However, it is known that the shape, area, and contour of the pond or aquarium has an effect on the fish and their behaviors. Therefore, areas of the pond or aquarium that are not illuminated can have an undesirable effect on the viewing enjoyment. Other known lighting systems rely upon projecting a light from an outside source onto the bottom or undersurface areas of the fish. The problem with this approach is that 0cc13bf012
