When writing methods for an interface, should you put the getter and setter methods of the property within the interface or should you just have them at the actual implementor class? public interface MyClass{ public String getMyProperty(); public void setMyProperty(String myProperty); } OR public class MyImplementationClass implements MyClass{ public String myProperty; ... } Is there a difference in how this is structured, and what variables are considered interface variables vs. 'internal' variables in Java? I've seen each of the two conventions, and I really can't seem to get a grip on whether there is a 'right' way or not. A:
