Plaintiff, however, relies on a number of instances where the defendants have been found to have acted negligently and on a theory of res ipsa loquitur to support its contention that the defendants were negligent. In any event, the fact that the defendants were given the benefit of the presumption of due care and the plaintiff had the burden of showing that their actions were negligent would appear to negate the relevance of plaintiff's evidence and argument concerning the negligence of the defendants. In addition, the record in this case is devoid of any evidence to support the plaintiff's theory that a chicken fell from a take off conveyor and hit the floor. Defendant McAllister testified that his conveyor was cleaned and inspected by both himself and the Longview facility, including inspection by the plaintiff's company. McAllister's conveyor was maintained in good working order. During the period in question, the only chicken loss at the Longview plant had been caused by the machine knocking over five or six more chickens. While McAllister could not recall any particular time when this occurred 0cc13bf012

We report on a theoretical investigation of the effect of chaos on the frequency locking of two coupled nonlinear oscillators whose mutual interaction is a nonlinear function of their frequencies. For small coupling, the system exhibits frequency locking which is induced by the interaction through frequency mismatches between the two elements. We show that frequency mismatches also appear in the absence of coupling due to the inherent differences in their dynamics and nonlinearities. If the coupling is strong enough, the system enters the regime of coherent chaos. We show that, for this regime, the system exhibits complete in-phase synchronization. We show that, for a given value of the coupling strength, the system undergoes a phase synchronization-desynchronization transition at a finite value of the frequency mismatch.Pioneers of an obscure and still turbulent technology were cited as part of the reasoning that the Baltimore-based Johns Hopkins University should acquire the 1.1 million square-foot bio-research incubator located in New York's Chelsea neighborhood, according to documents filed with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. The university's application for the initial public offering of Bio-Med Realty Group, Inc. described a pioneering role
