The embodiments described herein relate generally to medical devices and, more particularly, to non-electrolytic, non-biological oxygen-generating/release medical devices. Oxygen-generating devices are known in the art and are used to provide oxygen to a patient, for example to a human, and/or to provide oxygen to a patient's ambient air. Typical oxygen-generating devices include oxygen concentrators, which separate air into its component gases and then remove only the oxygen from the air stream. The processed air then flows to the patient to be breathed in as breathing gas. Another type of oxygen-generating device employs a solid state oxygen ion selective electrode and generates oxygen in response to a potential difference generated between the electrode and a second electrode that is positioned within the oxygen-generating device in close proximity to the first electrode. The oxygen-generating device may be configured as a single chamber device or as a series of oxygen-generating chambers that are positioned in fluid communication with one another. It is desirable to provide a biocompatible non-electrolytic, non-biological oxygen-generating device. Characterization and adsorption of arsenic to dithiomethane-modified macro-reticular anion exchanger with microporous resin. In this work, a macro-reticular anion exchanger with the quaternary ammonium functional group (HDTMA-16) was synthesized and characterized by elemental analysis and thermogravimetry. In addition, the adsorption property of the new resin to As(III) was also studied. According to the results of thermogravimetry, it was obvious that HDTMA-16 had good thermal stability at different
